Lessons Learned in Faculty Governance at CU Boulder, Paul Chinowsky

In his report, Paul Chinowsky noted that for faculty governance to be successful, trust, transparent communications, realistic expectations, the role of individual evaluations, and non-traditional connections must be taken into account. He also added that a historical perspective into past decisions and issues is also important in assuring that positive collaborations between the administration and faculty exist. He went on to discuss hindrances to faculty governance, including the lack support for faculty and staff governance as well as the lack of visibility of the Faculty Council. He asked several questions about how we can have stronger faculty governance, increase the number of quality faculty members participating, and how tangible support from administration can be encouraged. He concluded that he would welcome an opportunity to discuss how well faculty governance is working at a later date.
