Americans' indebtedness is legendary. However, did you know that 39 percent of adults carry no consumer debt (excluding mortgages), and for those who do have consumer debt, the average amount owed is in excess of $25,000, according to Gallup News <sup>[3]</sup>?

Taking Control of Debt

If you're on the owing end of the spectrum, your debt can interfere with many financial goals, from establishing an emergency fund to saving for the future. It can also lead to financial stress, delayed retirement and even bankruptcy.

However, debt can be managed while you save toward your goals. Even if the cumulative payment of credit cards, student loans, a mortgage and other outstanding loans affect the amount you save, there are steps you can take to reduce your debt while securing your financial future.

Six Steps Toward Debt Reduction

Follow these six steps to begin working down your debt in manageable pieces:

1. Identify what you owe. Take a full inventory of what you owe, to whom you owe it and the interest rate you're paying.
2. Track your spending. Track helps you see where your money goes and uncover opportunities for spending cuts.
3. Prioritize debt payments. Pay as much as you can on the highest interest loans, without sacrificing timely payment to other creditors.
4. Cut spending. Review your bills, focusing on monthly recurring charges. You can then decide where you can lessen payments, such as unused gym memberships.
5. Exercise more discipline. Don't charge more than what you can afford to pay off immediately. Put away high-rate charge cards. Avoid impulse purchases like frequent online shopping or that specialty pastry along with your cup of coffee.
6. Get counseling. Overspending can be a symptom of psychological stress that may require the assistance of a mental health professional.
